CHAP. III. Amjlerdam--Buildings--Remarkable Ohjeffs--Inhabitants--Trade--JV?alth, &c. AMSTERDAM appears to no great advantage to a stranger on his first coming into it, unless he makes his way through the Heeregracht, or the Keyzergracht streets: that of Haerlem is very long, but the fluices in the canal hurt the effect of it; the two former have also canals in the middle of them, and are very noble streets; but, like most in Holland, are planted with trees. I observed that some of the canals are very broad, and make a fine appearance; but the houses in general are not erected in a grand stile; on the contrary, very many of them disgrace the areas before them: this, though an evil, is in all the cities of Europe, and especially in London. In squares this great city appears to be very deficient; they are few in number, and have nothing: in them striking: that called the Dam is the principal, but but it is very irregular. It would be graced, by the Stadthouse, were it not for a vile old building that dissigures its noble front, and which it is a scandal to the government to leave in its present situation. But though Amsterdam cannot boast of many sine squares, like leveral other capital cities, yet it contains some public buildings, that strike the spectator with astonishment at the magnisicence to which trade has here attained. I was very desirous of viewing the principal objects in the city to the best advantage, and was fully gratified by the most obliging attention of Mcst. Sautyn and Rosevelt, who rank amongst the greatest merchants here, and to whom I brought letters of recommendation; they took every method of rendering my stay agreeable, and conducted me to most of the principal edifices themselves. Their friendly politeness I thus publicly acknowledg...
