Tamburlaine the Great

Christopher Marlowe

Tamburlaine the Great Christopher Marlowe

The play is often linked to Renaissance humanism which idealises the potential of human beings.

Tamburlaine's aspiration to immense power raises profound religious questions as he arrogates for himself a role as the "scourge of God" (an epithet originally applied to Attila the Hun). Some readers have linked this stance with the fact that Marlowe was accused of atheism. Others have been more concerned with a supposed anti-Muslim thread of the play, highlighted in a scene in which the main character burns the Qur'an.
